

FEMA says emergency-shelter plan was misread

By Lee Davidson
Deseret News staff writer

Salt Lake County commissioners hit the panic button this week when an Ohio official told them the federal government is proposing to shelter government officials during a nuclear attack but leave others to fend for themselves.

They quickly wrote a scathing letter to Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Julius Becton Jr. saying the plan is immoral and a waste of money. They also complained about reports that communities might not receive funding for emergencies such as flooding if they do not participate in the new plan.

But Marvin Davis, spokesman for FEMA in Denver, told the Deseret News that county officials' fears are founded on bad media reports on FEMA documents, and they should have checked directly with his agency before writing their letter.

He said a Washington Post story in May started a worldwide furor by what he says is incorrect reporting of a low-level FEMA paper that was in an early draft stage. That paper was one of the documents used to prepare a report released this week about the state of civil defense in various states. (Related story on A-16.)

"A working draft of that paper was given to Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., whom Davis said then gave it to the Washington Post. The senator gave it a cursory reading, if he read it at all. If he read it, he didn't understand it. Neither did the Post reporter," Davis said.

He said the report called for more emergency operation center bunkers, just like the one in the basement of the Metropolitan Hall of Justice in Salt Lake City. They serve as central communication headquarters for governments during emergencies ranging from floods to nuclear attack.

"Proxmire took that to mean we were proposing some type of super fallout bunkers for government officials," Davis said.

Another part of the early FEMA paper reported testimony before Congress by some officials who want more volunteers to teach emergency preparedness techniques such as storing food and how to build emergency fallout bunkers, Davis said.

He said Proxmire and the Washington Post took that to mean the general population was be called on to fend for itself during nuclear attack. He said FEMA still is helping local governments prepare other alternatives such as organized evacuation to safer areas.

Timothy F. Hagan, a Cuyahoga County commissioner in Cleveland, Ohio, read the Washington Post story and sent copies of it to 3,000 counties nationwide, asking them to adopt resolutions against what he thought was FEMA's plan to protect officials but not the general population.

Hagan's letter to Salt Lake County said, "No one in his right mind would spend public funds to promote this kind of insanity."

FEMA's Davis agrees. "We thought most people would be smart enough not to believe we would propose something like that. We thought they would at least call us to check it out." Salt Lake County officials did not make that call.

The county commissioners signed a letter this week and gave copies to the press that said, "Building bunkers for public officials while leaving other citizens to fend for themselves is unjustifiable on the grounds of the basic moral premises of our democracy as well as being a totally indefensible use of public funds."

"We urge you (FEMA) strongly to reconsider your focus and direct your attention and funding to programs that will provide actual help instead of pursuing a plan that appears to have little in the way of rational or solid premises to support it."

Despite the problems that the Ohio commissioner's letters and the Washington Post story may cause for FEMA, Davis said, the agency actually likes the extra attention that is being focused on civil defense problems.

"Our budget next year is only $126.5 million. That is only about 55 cents per person in the nation. We like any attention we can get," he said.

helps make the system workable.

University of Utah law professor Ronald N. Boyce is urging a change in Utah's prosecution that would guarantee a uniform policy.

Boyce was the first speaker to appear before the task force. He gave an example of how different parts of the state emphasize different prosecution policy, and how that type of policy can affect sentences.

He used as an example the prosecution of a Uintah County man on a conviction of bigamy.

The man was placed in the same cell at the state prison with a man convicted of manslaughter.

Boyce said the bigamist was sentenced more severely than the other convict — the bigamist getting a 1-20 year sentence and the man convicted of taking a life 1-15 years.

Boyce said counties in the states are not autonomous, and every county must follow the dictates of the state's legislature.

Colorado also employs specialized investigators, similar to the unit employed by the Salt Lake County Attorney's
